Talking About a Revolution

Author Frances Mahncke, center, with fellow NNV founders Patricia Kasdan, left, and Jo Ann Tanner.

We who are involved with NNV are on the forefront of a mass movement in the United States. When I say “we,” I mean inclusively members, volunteers, professional partners, preferred providers and donors.

“By 2050, demographers project that 1 in 5 Americans will be 65 or older, part of a ‘silver tsunami,’” Suzanne Bohan wrote in the Dec. 26, 2011 issue of the Los Angeles Times.

Only three years after NNV began enrolling its first members on March 1, 2009, a Google search on “age in place villages” produced about 94.2 million entries. It looks like the “silver tsunami” is under way.

When NNV’s founders first got excited about the village concept in 2007, Beacon Hill Village in Boston had been operating since 2001, long enough to write (and sell) a handbook of how to start a village, and Washington’s Capitol Hill Village had opened in 2007.

D.C. has “more [villages] than any city nationwide,” the District of Columbia State Office of AARP said when it launched its e-newsletter, AARP Village News, in late October 2011. According to Andrew Mollison, president of Palisades Village in the District, “As of March 5, 2012 there are 10 villages in D.C.—six operating villages and four in development.”

Mollison, also D.C. co-chair of Washington Area Village Exchange, identifies 26 villages in the Greater Washington area that are either operating or being formed. WAVE comprises aging-in-place village leaders from D.C., Maryland and Virginia that get together regularly to discuss issues affecting the movement.

Oral History Project: Snapshot of a Life

Edith Couturier had an early role model for her career as a scholar. Her mother, Pauline Boorstein, wrote a master's thesis at Columbia University on the motivations leading different ethnic groups to move to the suburbs, focusing in part on Great Neck, Long Island. Ideas and data from her mother's book were later featured in Judith Goldstein's book, Inventing Great Neck.

Edith's secondary education was at the progressive Cambridge School in Massachusetts; she earned a B.A. from Sarah Lawrence College, an M.A. from Long Island
University, and, in 1965, a Ph.D. in history from Columbia University.
Edith's area of interest at Columbia was Latin American history. Based on research she did in Mexico, she wrote her dissertation on the 1930s agrarian movement in a silver mining region of Mexico.

In 1961 she married Jacques Couturier, who worked for a labor union in Albany.
While still working on her dissertation, she taught at Albany State College. They moved to Washington in 1965, where her husband became executive director of the National Civil Service League. In 1967, when they were raising a young son and awaiting the birth of a daughter, they suddenly acquired four more children upon the death of her husband's widower brother. Their house on Oliver Street NW was not large enough for the suddenly expanded family, so they moved to a larger place on Chevy Chase Parkway.
The children attended Lafayette School.

During her time in Washington between 1965 and 1980 (interrupted only by several years spent in Evanston, Ill., while her husband taught in the public management program at Northwestern University), Edith taught history at the University of Maryland and American and Georgetown universities. In 1982 she worked at the National Endowment for the Humanities, dealing with summer seminars and fellowships for college teachers in the humanities.

She also pursued studies in women's history, and was awarded a Fulbright Scholarship for work in the area of philanthropy.

After retiring from NEH in 1995, she wrote a book, The Silver King (published by the University of New Mexico Press), about the life of a silver mining entrepreneur in Mexico.
She has high praise for the Hispanic Division of the Library of Congress for resources that helped in the writing of that book.

Edith has many interests outside scholarship. She enjoys time with children, nephews and nieces, served as president of her condominium association for 13 years and belongs to the Adas Israel synagogue. She takes advantage of Washington's many cultural offerings—ballet, the Washington Opera, book groups (a women's reading group and, at Politics and Prose, a spirituality reading group)—and is a strong supporter of the village movement; she enjoys the yoga class and other offerings of Northwest Neighbors Village. She is the first member to be interviewed as part of the Oral History Project that NNV is conducting in concert with Historic Chevy Chase DC.

national organization, assists village start-ups and established villages by providing organizational tools and online access to topical discussion groups. Natalie Galucia, program coordinator for VTV Network, reports that it currently lists 70 open villages and about 115 in development nationwide.

Many of these follow the Beacon Hill Village pattern: a small professional staff and a cadre of volunteers who provide services to members who pay annual dues, as NNV does. Others, such as Partners in Care, exchange assistance—members receive credit for their volunteer time that they can exchange for the help of other volunteers.

There are also growing numbers of Naturally Occurring Retirement Communities. NORCs occur when a group of residents over age 60 live together cooperatively in a single housing complex or apartment building. In general, these are not purpose-built senior housing or retirement communities. Either residents have aged in place or migrated to the apartment complex. Frequently NORCs are more informal and may not turn up in a Web search. When NNV was first organizing, we heard of one such arrangement initiated in the Watergate and one functioning in the Van Ness North apartments.

When AARP did a survey two years ago, 92 percent of those surveyed said they wanted to grow older at home surrounded by the neighbors they had known over the years. Maybe that has always been true, but nobody had thought to ask us seniors before and there was no clear path to achieving this without a lot of personal expense: home helpers, taxis, handymen and yard/snow people. The village, which forms a clearinghouse that coordinates volunteers to perform

Social events are a big part of the village movement. Inspecting the ship that will host this spring's Bermuda cruise: Frank and Frances Mahncke, NNV President Janean Mann and NNV member and tour organizer Benita Lubic.

many of these services, makes living at home possible for a lot of retired people with ordinary resources. For more complex jobs, NNV has a list of preferred providers.

The village movement is attracting those who serve seniors to focus their efforts. The National Aging in Place Council, a senior support network that connects service providers with elderly homeowners, their families and caretakers, sponsors a National Aging in Place Week each year. Companies offering in-home assistance and contractors specializing in modifying homes have jumped in to help in response to the aging-in-place movement. Clearly the village movement has broad appeal.

The nation's lack of preparation for the 10,000 baby boomers who are turning 65 each day is a pressing concern for those involved in providing for them. States are having to look at what they can provide, what they may no longer be able to provide and how their planning can be more creative, said Susan Poor, a senior policy advisor at NCB Capital Impact, in an interview with Senior Housing News published on Oct. 23, 2011. "It's going to take more than government to handle the demands," she said, "... [and] villages are able to fill in the gap."

There's no doubt—those of us involved in the movement are creating a revolution by aging in place.

Danielle Feuillan

Spotlight on Danielle Feuillan

Danielle Feuillan has joined the NNV administrative office team as a part-time administrative coordinator. She will be working 10 hours a week on a variety of projects including helping us improve the NNV Web site.

Prior to joining the NNV team, Danielle managed all aspects of the Web site for the National Park Service Heritage Areas Program. She currently volunteers with the D.C. Public Library in the Washingtoniana Collection, where she assesses and rehouses the Peabody Collection that was critically damaged in the 2007 fire at the Georgetown Library branch.

Raised in Cleveland Park, Danielle is a graduate of Barnard College at Columbia University and Goucher College. She lives in the Chevy Chase, D.C. with her family. Welcome aboard, Danielle!

Selling, and Building, a Community

Claudia Donovan does not simply sell houses; she sells community. “I tell people they are not just buying bricks and mortar; they are buying into a way of life,” she said. After nearly four decades in the real estate business Claudia still loves her work, especially “the relationships that you develop with people. I love assisting buyers to find the right house . . . and helping sellers let go of the house that holds so many memories.”

Claudia, who affiliated with Sotheby’s last year, works primarily in Chevy Chase, D.C., where she and her family have lived since 1988. She wants people to know that “Chevy Chase is a community that cares about every segment of the population.” At her open houses, brochures about Northwest Neighbors Village, the Avalon Theatre and the Chevy Chase Community Center are prominently displayed.

Supporting neighborhood organizations is one way Claudia invests in her community. This year, she and a few colleagues have underwritten the winter series of children’s programs at the Avalon. Puppet shows, singers, concerts and other live performances bring families into the Avalon, which she sees as an “energy gathering place.”

Northwest Neighbors Village also benefits from Claudia’s generosity. She has been an enthusiastic supporter since the day her friend Bob Holman, NNV’s vice president, introduced her to the organization. In 2011, she joined the fundraising committee and brought in $2,000 for the year-end appeal. Recently, she pledged a contribution after each house sale. (On average, she sells 25-30 homes per year.)

Claudia wishes there had been a village serving the Long Island, N.Y. neighborhood where she grew up so her widowed mother could have stayed in the home she shared with her husband for 45 years. Unfortunately, there was no village, so her mother moved to D.C. As Donovan tells it, “We got her into a retirement house very near us, but she was not happy. She didn’t want the activities; she didn’t want to meet new friends; she wanted to be back in her house.” Claudia’s donations to NNV are made in her mother’s memory.

Claudia Donovan

Elder Issues Seminar Recap

“Elder Issues: Facilitating Difficult Family Conversations,” co-sponsored by the Chevy Chase Citizens Association and Northwest Neighbors Village on March 20, drew 53 participants. “This was a packed house...the first time ever for this many people in the audience,” said John Lawlor, president of CCCA.

Panelist Myrna Fawcett, an elder law attorney, spoke about the legal issues that should be considered in planning for the future and identified critical documents that should be prepared. Steve Altman, a practicing commercial mediator who teaches negotiation skills at Georgetown Law School (and is NNV board assistant treasurer), discussed how to address issues that families often find hard to talk about. Carolyn Rodis, who specializes in elder-care mediation, described when and how the use of a neutral third party is appropriate and helpful to assist a family in having the conversation, and Diane Suess, RN, of Jewish Social Services, talked about assessment and options for care as family members are aging.

The program, designed to assist families in planning for, discussing, and taking action on the difficult issues that come with the aging process, was well received.

Marianna Blagburn, executive director of NNV, noted that the role of the Village is to “deepen the conversation on the issues we face as we grow older, including sensitive topics.”

Diana Seasonwein wrote on the Chevy Chase listserv, “Marianna and CCCA, thank you for putting last night’s program together. The speakers were all excellent, and all are good resources for these difficult and important issues.”

Private Tour Of Hokusai Prints

NNV members and volunteers are invited to join a Sackler Gallery tour of the acclaimed print series “Thirty-six Views of Mount Fuji” by Katsushika Hokusai (1760-1849) on Tuesday, April 24 at 2:30 p.m. This exhibit features images of worldwide renown including “The Great Wave” and other iconic works which marked a pivotal point in Japanese print publishing, incorporating innovative compositions, techniques and coloration and establishing landscape as a new subject.

Metro transportation to the red line Smithsonian stop is recommended. For those who wish to make an extended outing that day, you can have a pre-tour lunch at the poolside pavilion cafe in the sculpture garden just across the Mall.

To make a tour reservation, call the village at (202) 237-1895. Those participating in the tour should plan to be assembled as a group in the entrance level lobby of the Sackler before 2:30. The group will be limited to 15 but guests will be welcome if spaces are available.

Hokusai’s “The Great Wave.” —Sackler Gallery

An added attraction: The adjoining Freer Gallery holds an unrivaled collection of Hokusai paintings and drawings and many are now on view in the Japanese screen gallery and in galleries 6 and 7. Some of you may wish to see these works on your own following the tour.

—Ann Collins, NNV member and Sackler docent

A Hokusai Book

The Printmaker’s Daughter by Katherine Govier, biographical fiction set in the Edo Period, describes Hokusai’s life and posits a controversial theory that his daughter was instrumental in creating his works and may have been the main creator of prints done in his 70s, 80s and 90s. It’s a good read and gives you a sense of the times in which he lived. It is available through the D.C. Library and on Amazon.

Men's Book Group Delves Into Meaning for Second Half of Life

We are having a good time. The Northwest Neighbors Village men's book group meets one afternoon each month. We are exploring a book by Richard Rohr, a Franciscan friar who has written extensively on various aspects of the spiritual journey. The book is entitled Falling Upward: A Spirituality for the Two Halves of Life. His thesis is that the first half of life is driven by achievement. We have to make our mark, accomplish something and establish our identity. Somewhere along the way a transition must take place to the second half of life, when we experience life as a gift. Tragically, there are those who live their entire lives in the first mode and never experience grace.

The book has inspired some animated conversations about how to grow old gracefully. We have concluded that Bette Davis was right when she said, "Old age is not for sissies." Aging well is a challenge and an opportunity to experience the mutuality of life with kindred spirits.

There are seven in our group: John Collins, Bernard Hillenbrand, Stew Reuter, John Ryan, Elton Smith, Kevin Taecker and Ed White. We include three retired career military and three retired clergy. So far the "peacemakers" and the "warriors" are getting along just fine.

"This small group has had vast travel and life experiences, which Ed's leadership helps us to share," says the Rev. Bernard F. Hillenbrand. "It gives us a fresh new experience in the great joy of living in this community."

If there are other men among our NNV membership who would like to participate in such a book club we would be glad to create a second group.

Don't Be Scammed

Malicious Spyware Calls

Residents in Northwest D.C. and other parts of the country are receiving calls from individuals claiming to be from Microsoft or other computer operating system developers.

The callers claim that Microsoft has received a message from your computer that it is infected with malware or a virus. They mention the names of respected antivirus software and offer to install antivirus software. If you decline, the caller threatens to revoke your computer's operating system license. This is a total scam. They install rogue software applications that display fake security alerts to persuade you to pay for useless licenses.

Microsoft told NNV that they "will never, repeat never, cold-call people who use Windows." Microsoft advises you never to respond to cold calls regarding your computer. As a remedy, Microsoft recommends asking for a callback phone number and reporting the incident. Further, the FBI suggests filing a complaint at www.ic3.gov; ic3 is the FBI Internet crime code. The site is monitored by other federal agencies as well.

Tax scams

With the tax deadline looming, tax scam artists are popping out of the woodwork. One scam involves an unsolicited e-mail or a fake Web site allegedly from the IRS that prompts individuals to provide personal and financial information, which is then used for identity theft. The IRS does not initiate contact with taxpayers by e-mail to request personal or financial information. Report these fraudulent e-mails by forwarding them to phishing@irs.gov.

D.C. Property Tax Relief for Seniors

For District of Columbia households with at least one owner/resident 65 years or older, the D.C. Office of Tax and Revenue offers a 50 percent reduction on their property taxes. To qualify for this reduction, the household's federal adjusted gross income must be less than $100,000. (D.C. Council member Muriel Bowser, D-Ward 4, is considering the introduction of legislation to increase the income limit from $100,000 to $125,000.)

To find out if you qualify for this reduction, call the D.C. Office of Tax and Revenue at (202) 727-4829. If the office thinks you will qualify, it will send you a form to complete (FR-HD Homestead Deduction and Senior Citizen/Disabled Property Tax Relief Application). There will be an instruction sheet included with the form that explains the program.

‘Smart Meter’ Installation Generates Confusion, Concerns

The recent installation of “smart meters” in Northwest D.C. as part of Pepco’s overall “smart grid” plan has generated much confusion, particularly over the safety and privacy aspects of the program. There is also substantial opposition to Pepco’s request for a rate increase to cover the cost of the program, at least partially because of Pepco’s poor service record. That increase is pending before the D.C. Public Service Commission.

Pepco applied to the PSC to begin its “smart grid” plan in 2007. In conjunction with the PSC and the Office of the People’s Counsel, Pepco in 2008-09 implemented a pilot smart meter program, called PowerCentsDC, in nearly 900 randomly selected homes. The success of that pilot project prompted Pepco to expand the program. In 2009 the D.C. Council approved this expansion. The Federal American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 provided $44.6 million of the estimated $89.3 million implementation cost. A pilot program analysis showed general customer support for the program and a reduction in energy usage and some lowered costs to Pepco users.

In October 2010, Pepco began replacing traditional electric meters with “smart meters” in D.C.—a project now 97 percent completed. Why? Smart meters have several advantages. They provide a two-way communication between Pepco and the homeowner to offer customers more information on their electrical usage to help control electricity consumption. This two-way communication also permits Pepco to get actual readings from your meter for billing purposes instead of employing meter readers or estimating usage. (I once received an estimated bill that was three times what I actually owed, so more accuracy is a real plus.) This two-way communication also addressed in the pilot program study. The meters operate on wireless radio frequencies or RF akin to those produced by microwaves and cellphones. They produce RF emissions of two types—thermal and non-thermal. These emissions have many in D.C. and across the country concerned about the meters’ impact on health and safety.

The Federal Communications Commission and the independent California Council on Science and Technology have said the thermal emissions are within acceptable standards, but the CCST said there is insufficient data on the potential non-thermal RF impact to ascertain smart meter safety. A big question has to do with the frequency of RF emissions. Pepco claims that the emissions take less than a second and occur only every four to six hours. Others challenge this assertion.

Critics also worry that the information gained by Pepco threatens customer privacy. Pepco says it is working with a variety of federal agencies on this issue and that it must submit plans to the PSC to describe how it will protect customer data.

Currently, the new meters are required and customers cannot opt out of the “smart meter” usage unless the D.C. Council adopts a law to that effect. The OPC recently appealed a February 2012 decision by the Public Service Commission denying an economic and feasibility study of permitting customers to opt out.

—Janean Mann

Checking a new meter. —Pepco enables Pepco to identify power outages more quickly.

Pepco is also proposing two pricing programs—dynamic pricing and direct-load control. Dynamic pricing is based on market conditions. Consumers are alerted when prices are high and rewarded for lowering their energy consumption during those periods. Direct-load control is a voluntary program in which consumers allow Pepco to control their central air conditioning usage when energy prices are high. This program has yet to be approved by the PSC.

Concerns have arisen about the meters’ usage that were not
